The first part of the report, covering the period from 1945 to 1947, shows a steady increase in the number of cases reported. This was due to a combination of factors, including the discovery of new cases and the implementation of more rigorous reporting procedures.

The second part of the report, covering the period from 1948 to 1950, shows a similar trend. The number of cases continued to rise, and the data indicates that the disease was spreading to new areas. This was a significant development, as it suggested that the disease was becoming more widespread.

The third part of the report, covering the period from 1951 to 1953, shows a slight decrease in the number of cases reported. This was due to a combination of factors, including the implementation of more rigorous reporting procedures and the discovery of new cases.

The fourth part of the report, covering the period from 1954 to 1956, shows a steady increase in the number of cases reported. This was due to a combination of factors, including the discovery of new cases and the implementation of more rigorous reporting procedures.

The fifth part of the report, covering the period from 1957 to 1959, shows a steady increase in the number of cases reported. This was due to a combination of factors, including the discovery of new cases and the implementation of more rigorous reporting procedures.
